The company uses a technique called multi-party computation (MPC).

Stepping back, blockchains are based on public key infrastructure (PKI), which means your identity is determined by a set of digits called a public key that allows you to receive funds. That public key is a mathematical function of another set of digits, a private key, which must be known in order to send funds.

Instead of a single private key, MPC involves several parties each with different strings of numbers that interact using a protocol. The process creates a public key to receive funds, and a way to sign transactions in order to send funds. This latter part is kept distributed and separate at all times. |

The HOPR protocol is a layer-0 privacy foundation for anyone to buidl on.

HOPR is not another on-chain privacy solution for blockchain transactions, explained HOPR co-founder Sebastian Bürgel, but a general network-layer protocol to allow users to exchange data privately, in the same vein as Tor (the onion router) or a virtual private network (VPN).

The idea to incentivize participants with tokens to enhance the privacy of a network is not entirely new; the Ethereum-based Orchid protocol does this, too. |

As projects like Opyn become more robust they will create ways for thesis-driven investors to make money via contrarian positions

Opyn offers oTokens, which are basically insurance policies, but without insurance adjusters. So here's how a user would insure their USDC using the product. An oToken would allow them, for a small fee, to recover most of the investment's value if they turned in the underlying token. |
